

Veterinary Receptionist

INDUSTRY FACTS

What do veterinary receptionists do?

This program will prepare you to become a veterinary assistant and a medical office manager. Veterinary assistants work with animals daily. You'll also gain the market flexibility to work as a medical office manager in a veterinary clinic or in a variety of other medical facilities and move into a management role as you gain experience.

Here's a breakdown of what your day-to-day might look like:

- Feeding, bathing, and exercising animals
- Monitoring and nursing animals after surgery
- Restraining animals during exams and procedures
- Cleaning and prepping equipment and facilities
- Managing day-to-day operations
- Creating and updating electronic health records
- Scheduling and coordinating appointments
- Verifying patient insurance

Where do they work?

Veterinary assistants work primarily in veterinary clinics and practices. Medical office managers work in any type of medical facility. Completing both veterinary assisting and medical office manager training gives you the option to manage a veterinary office.

How much do they earn?

How much you earn depends on what field you choose. Salaries and benefits will vary by employer, geographic location, and experience. But veterinary assistants earn between $21,170 and $30,460 a year on average, while medical administrative assistants earn an average salary of $39,000 a year.

How's the job outlook?

Veterinary assistants are part of the rapidly expanding pet industry, valued at $60 billion a year. Medical administrative assistants work in the rapidly growing healthcare industry. The U.S. Department of Labor estimates the demand for veterinary assistants will grow to 16,000 new jobs before 2026.
